

Visitors to Britain are surprised by the strange behaviour of the inhabitants. One of the worst mistakes is to get on a bus without waiting your turn in the queue. The other people in the queue will probably complain loudly. Drivers in cars can become quite aggressive if they think you are jumping the queue in a traffic jam. People respond to queue jumping in an emotional way. Newspaper headlines describe anger at people who pay to bypass a hospital waiting list to get an operation more quickly. Queuing is a national habit and it is considered polite or good manners to wait your turn.

In recent years smoking has received a lot of bad publicity, and fewer British people now smoke. Many companies have banned smoking from their offices and canteens. It is becoming less and less acceptable to smoke in a public place. Smoking is now banned on the London underground, in cinemas and theatres and most buses, and there are special smokers' carriages on trains. It is considered rude or bad manners to smoke in someone's house without asking 'do you mind if I smoke?'. Public attitudes are reflected in 'Lonely Hearts' columns, where people advertise for non-smoking partners, and in advertisements for flats or houses to rent.

On the other hand, in some countries it is considered bad manners to eat in the streets, whereas in Britain it is common to see people having a snack whilst walking down the road, especially at lunch time. Britons may be surprised to see young children in restaurants in the evenings because children are not usually taken to restaurants late at night and, if they make a noise in public or in a restaurant, it is considered very rude. In Victorian times it used to be said that 'children should be seen and not heard', since children did not participate at all in public life. In recent years children are playing a more active role and they are now accepted in many pubs and restaurants. Good and bad manners make up the social rules of a country and are not always easy to learn because they are often not written down in books. These rules may also change as the society develops; for example, women did not go into pubs at the beginning of the 20th century because it was not considered respectable behaviour for a woman. Now both men and women drink freely in pubs and women are fully integrated into public life.

We may think that someone from a different country is being rude when their behaviour would be perfectly innocent in their own country. Social rules are an important part of our culture as they are passed down through history. The British have an expression for following these 'unwritten rules': 'When in Rome do as the Romans do'.
